the needy individuals and families and assessments were made to find out the specific interventions needed. Frequent exposure to grassroots issues of needy individuals and families provided an understanding of human behavior. The understanding of human behavior and the idea of "helping them to help themselves" paved the way for the development of Social Case Work.In 1898 COS's of New York started training course for workers involved in the activities of COS's. Later on New York School of Philanthropy was created which today is known as Columbia University of Social Work. From 1911 onwards Case work had emerged in USA as an accepted formal technique and as the early social workers handled cases of families in need, they were called caseworkers in USA.
